Flonzie Brown-Wright, 73, a Mississippi civil rights icon who fearlessly worked to get blacks registered to vote in the 1960s, has been recognized numerous times for her work. She was the first African-American woman to be elected to public office in Mississippi since Reconstruction. But this Friday's event – the dedication of a Canton City Hall courtroom in her honor – may surpass previous recognitions. The courtroom in City Hall is also the same place where her father – Frank Brown Sr. – was denied his plumber's and electrician's license about 60 years ago. Her father took the test to receive the license three times in the room, and though he passed every time, the superintendent failed him every time. Brown-Wright says that on his death bed, the superintendent called for her father and apologized for what he had done, telling her dad, "Will you forgive me 'cause every time you took that test, you passed, but we were not ready to allow a black man, a colored man to unstop a toilet with a license." Eventually, her dad did receive his license. Around 1965, Brown-Wright was Canton's NAACP branch manager. Typically, she brought groups to the Madison County Court-

Jasmine Murray, Miss Mississippi 2014, is continuing the platform she focused on during her reign. Speaking at New Hope Baptist Church's third series of Black History Month programs Feb. 18, her message was designed to encourage girls and young women to think positively about themselves and to make good life choices.

The theme of the program was "Youth Heritage Night: Committed to Moving Forward." She told the audience honoring the past and people who came before us is necessary. "Without your past you wouldn't be the person you are today," Murray said. "Even though I tell you to honor your past, don't dwell on it either. Take advantage of the day you have right now. Focus on everything to prepare for your future," the Columbus native said. She said finding one's gift is key. "God gave me a passion for music," said Murray, who was the first Mississippian to become a finalist on the TV show "American Idol." "Whatever your passion, it's from

City, state issue water warnings

From Staff Reports

The city of Jackson addressed concerns about lead in the city's water system Wednesday. In a press release, the city reported that Jackson's water has not been deemed unsafe. However, pregnant women and small children should follow the Mississippi Department of Health's recommendations for prevention of lead exposure from drinking water. The city was notified by the MSDH Jan. 28, that random water samples from 13 out of 58 homes showed lead above the actionable levels of 0.015. The agency retrieved the samples in June 2015 and received the results in July 2015. The city is taking additional compliance measures, including more frequent sampling and taking measures to mitigate the reaction of the finished water with piping, plumbing and service lines. Mitigation measures typically include implementation of flushing programs and optimizing corrosion control during the treatment process. Jackson's source water and finished drinking water leaving the plant do not contain lead, according to the release. Lead enters the water from the corrosion of ma-

By Natalie Bell

Like their "colored," educated and middle-class forerunners, who saw that they were no better than anyone else until the whole race of black people worked together to pull one another up, new inductees of the National Association of Colored Women Clubs continue to pick up and proclaim the club's motto: "Lifting as we climb." Established in 1896, NACWC is the nation's oldest African-American civic organization and in 2010 still reigned among the country's top 10 non-profit organizations, according to Ebony magazine. On Feb. 20, the Eureka Arts Federated Club,
