The incredible resilience of black Mississippians in the era of racial segregation still resonates at Prentiss Normal and Industrial Institute, a century-old institution still standing strong in the south-central area of the state, in rural Jefferson Davis County.

A Board of Trustees, comprised of community leaders, alumni and supporters, maintain many of the former school's buildings and has fashioned the campus, a museum and cultural heritage center.

Professor Jonas Edward Johnson and wife, Bertha LaBranche Johnson, founded Prentiss Institute in 1907. The Johnsons, two important figures in black Mississippi history, were early 20th century leaders in education and racial advancement in the state.

They established the privately-run Prentiss Institute to provide educational opportunities that would enable young blacks from limited financial means to become productive and responsible citizens. Many students went on to become successful educators, businessmen and professionals in a variety of fields.

The Johnsons ran the school in Booker T. Washington-fashion for most of its existence. They stressed individual guidance and a balanced program of instruction in an academic and Christian atmosphere.

"Had it not been for Prentiss Institute, many of its students would not have had a chance to further their education beyond eighth grade," said Mitchel Gamblin, a 1950 alum, who went on to obtain academic degrees in education and government from Grambling University and the Univ. of Northern Colorado. Gamblin then returned to teach in Jefferson Davis County, where he was born and raised.

City gets results from water samples

By Shanderia K. Posey

On Wednesday, about a week after the city of Jackson was notified that water samples from 13 residences contained elevated lead levels, preliminary resampling results from those same residences show no lead in six of the residences.

The other preliminary results reveal five locations have markedly lower levels of lead and of those five, two locations still exceed the actionable level by 1 ppb (parts per billion). As for the last two residences, one property is now vacant, and it was learned a private well was being used at the other location.

Director of Public Works Kishia Powell met with Mississippi Department of Health representatives Wednesday to discuss the preliminary results and the next steps to address the locations exceeding the action level for lead. Next steps will include identifying funding to upgrade corrosion control measures and increased monitoring in the distribution system.

Tougaloo College students will soon wrap up the water drive which started Jan. 25, to help alleviate the crisis in Flint, Mich. Donations will be accepted until 5 p.m. Feb 5.

The Tougaloo student recruiters and Tougaloo Ambassadors of Meritorious Scholars, struck an interest in the crisis and planned the drive.

"Our students span the world. They look toward the interest and commitment of the college and represent that," said Tougaloo President Beverly Wade Hogan in support of the drive.

Karen Weaver, the first woman mayor of Flint, is an alumnus of Tougaloo College. Before Weaver's election in November 2015, she took a major interest in the water issues of her city.

Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sander's HBCU tour, Feel the Bern, made a stop at Tougaloo College Jan. 28, for a campaign rally.

The rally was held to discuss important issues like income equality, tuition-free public colleges and universities, and racial justice. The event also included college rituals such as the student spirit chants that engaged rally officials and students, dancing and pan-hellic recognition.

Campaign and voting information was shared by Danny D. Glover, outreach campaign director; South Carolina Rep. Justin Bamberg; Keelan Sanders, a Mississippi Democratic National Committee member and Tougaloo alumnus; and David Banner, recording artist and Jackson native.
